While specific "inheritance" of a membership spot is not part of the Bohemian Club bylaws, many members of the Riese family maintained connections to the club and the Cave Man camp over several decades.

Wallis Richard "Tom" Riese Jr.

- Status: As the son of a high-ranking member (Wallis Riese Sr.),

  Tom Riese would have been eligible for "legacy" consideration, which significantly streamlined the typically 10-to-15-year waiting list for Regular Membership.

- Guest Privileges: Before becoming a full member, Tom likely attended the summer encampments as a guest of his father at the Cave Man camp. In this elite circle, it was common for sons to be introduced to their father's camp-mates, who in the 1950s and 60s included figures like Herbert Hoover and major California industrialists.

The "Legacy" Connection

Under the club's tradition and bylaws:

- Sponsorship: To join, Tom would have needed sponsorship from two current members. Having a father in a prestigious camp like Cave Man provided the highest level of internal sponsorship possible.
- Camp Affiliation: Membership in a specific camp is technically separate from club membership, but sons of "Cave Men" almost exclusively joined their father's camp if a spot opened up, ensuring the family's "real estate and civic" influence remained represented at that specific table.

Gravesite Locations for the Brothers

- Wallis Riese Sr. (d. 1965): Mount Tamalpais Cemetery in San Rafael.
- Ernie Riese (d. 1973): Following the family's shift from San Francisco to the suburbs, he is likely interred at Cypress Lawn or Holy Cross in Colma, or near his brother in San Rafael.
- Caspar Riese (d. 1959): Holy Cross Catholic Cemetery in Colma.
- Tom Riese (d. 2003): Mount Tamalpais Cemetery in San Rafael, interred alongside his father.

As of March 2026, the Riese family is recognized in San Francisco history as a prime example of the "old guard" whose influence spanned the SFPD, Real Estate, and the city's most private social institution
