Investigating the 732 23rd Avenue property during the critical 48-hour window after the Paul Stine murder (October 11–13, 1969) requires a targeted search of historical police and newspaper archives.

1. SFPD Service Calls (October 11–13, 1969)
Publicly accessible summaries of dispatch logs for that specific weekend do not currently highlight 732 23rd Avenue as a site of major police activity. However, standard SFPD records for "Calls for Service" from 1969 are archived in a format that requires a formal request:

- The Log: You would need to request a CAD (Computer-Aided Dispatch) printout or its historical equivalent for the Richmond District. A "suspicious person" or "prowler" report at this address on that night would be a significant breakthrough.
- Witness Proximity: Given the property's location in the Richmond, any report of a man entering this house shortly after the 9:55 PM murder would align with the suspect's known escape direction.

2. San Francisco Chronicle "For Rent" Search
A search for rental listings in October 1969 provides a glimpse into the family's property management during this period:

- Post-Probate Listing: Since Wallis Riese Sr. died in August 1968, the house at 732 23rd Avenue would have been in transition by late 1969. Historical San Francisco Chronicle classifieds often listed Richmond District rentals with the instruction to "Apply at [Owner/Manager Address]" or a specific phone number.
- The Riese Nexus: If a rental ad appeared for this house (or others in the Riese portfolio) in October 1969, the contact person would likely have been Thomas Riese. An ad with a showing time near the date of the murder could explain his presence in the neighborhood at night.
- Archives: Full-text digital scans of the Chronicle from this era are available via the SF Public Library's NewsBank database.

3. Property Status: 732 23rd Avenue
The property is a classic single-family Richmond District home, consistent with the Riese family's middle-class residential holdings. In 1969, its status as a "family home in transition" would have made it an ideal unmonitored location for someone familiar with its layout.
