While membership in elite San Francisco clubs like the Commonwealth Club or the Commercial Club would firmly establish the Riese family within the city's "power circle," specific 1960s rosters for these organizations are generally not digitized and require manual archival lookup.

1. The Commonwealth Club of California
Founded in 1903, the Commonwealth Club is the nation's oldest and largest public affairs forum.

- The Elite Connection: In the 1960s, it was a primary gathering spot for the Bay Area's business, legal, and political leaders.
- Zodiac Context: If Tom Riese or Wallis Jr. were members, they would have had regular, low-profile access to the same rooms as high-ranking police officials and judges.
- Where to Verify: The Hoover Institution Library & Archives at Stanford University holds the Commonwealth Club of California records (1903–2012), which include membership correspondence and lists.

2. The San Francisco Commercial Club
Located in the Merchants Exchange Building, this was the definitive "old guard" business club for the city's second-generation elite.

- Property Syndicate Links: Membership was heavily composed of real estate investors, contractors, and developers—the exact professional sphere of the Riese family.
- Where to Verify: Historical member lists from the early 20th century are digitized, but for the 1960s, you must consult the San Francisco Blue Book and Club Directory for that specific year, available at the SF Public Library History Center.

3. Strategic "Insider" Access
Membership in these clubs provided more than just social status; it provided proximity to power:

- Police Ties: As established earlier, Tom's cousin Chapman Riese was an SFPD Lieutenant. Combined with club memberships, Tom would have occupied a social stratum that was effectively "above suspicion."
- The "Broker" Persona: In these settings, a suspect like Tom Riese would be viewed solely as a successful businessman, allowing him to blend in perfectly while scouting the very neighborhood (Presidio Heights) where the Stine murder occurred.

Organization	Demographic	Records Location
Commonwealth Club	Intellectual/Political Elite	Hoover Institution Archives
Commercial Club	Business/Real Estate Leaders	SFPL Blue Book Collection
Bohemian Club	High-Level Private Elite	SFGenealogy / Library Archives