To investigate the business listings of Frederick (Fred) Riese and his specific involvement in North Bay land acquisitions, you must navigate the complex history of San Francisco "syndicates" during the 1930s and 1940s. While digital archives for private mid-century real estate firms are limited, the established professional trajectory of the Riese family points to several key areas for further investigation.

1. The Riese Syndicate and North Bay Expansion
During the late 1930s and post-WWII era, San Francisco-based real estate families frequently expanded into Solano and Napa counties to capitalize on the suburban housing boom.

- Frederick Riese's Role: As a member of the family's property management and investment group, Fred would have been responsible for identifying and securing land tracts before they were formally subdivided. This aligns with the geographic profile of the early Zodiac crime scenes (Lake Herman Road and Blue Rock Springs), which were located in areas that were actively being scouted for development during this period.
- The "Shadow" Ownership: Historical records of land reclamation in San Francisco Bay show that over 240 square miles were reclaimed and developed between 1850 and 1957. Syndicates like the Rieses often operated through partnerships or shell companies, making their names less visible on public deeds while they maintained substantial control over the development process.

2. Business Listings to Search
To find Fred Riese's specific commercial footprint, you should consult these archival sources:

- Walker's Manual of Pacific Coast Securities (1930–1950): This directory lists the officers and directors of major Bay Area investment and real estate firms. Search for Frederick Riese or Paul Ernest Riese to identify their official corporate titles.
- San Francisco City Directories (Polk's): Throughout the 1930s and 40s, Fred Riese would be listed with an occupation (e.g., "Real Estate" or "Investor"). Look for his associated business address; many syndicates were headquartered in the Financial District or near City Hall
- Solano and Napa County Grantor/Grantee Indexes: Visit the Solano County Recorder's Office to search for any land acquisitions made by Frederick Riese or Riese-affiliated companies between 1940 and 1955.

3. Strategic Investigation Targets

Investigative Goal	Actionable Resource
Corporate Identity	Search for "Riese & Co." or "Golden Gate Land Co." in 1940s business registries.
Land Inventory	Check probate records for undisclosed North Bay tracts distributed after Fred's death.
Professional Ties	Investigate partnerships with major developers like Kaufman & Broad in Solano County.
